Programme Summary

Intensive leadership skills training for senior managers is the subject of this two-week training course, which ends with a personal leadership action plan for one live challenge. Directors and heads of function often rise on technical strength and then lead people, peers and change with little structured practice. The programme alternates short input with simulations, peer coaching and feedback, applied to cases from finance, health and public services. Mars Training Centre UK delivers this programme on intensive leadership skills training for mixed-organisation cohorts.

The Business Case

Senior managers set the tone for decisions, conduct and pace across their units. When their leadership habits go untested, teams wait for direction, conflicts travel upwards and change initiatives lose momentum. A structured period of rehearsal, with feedback from peers and facilitators, helps leaders see their own patterns and replace them with deliberate choices.

- Team Engagement: Improves as leaders match direction and support to the readiness of each person.
- Decision Cycle Time: Shortens as decision rights and criteria are agreed before pressure builds.
- Change Adoption: Strengthens as change is planned around stakeholder readiness and early evidence of progress.

Principles and Evidence Base

- Situational Leadership by Hersey and Blanchard: It guides how direction and support are matched to readiness in Session 3.
- Goleman's emotional intelligence model: It structures the self-awareness and self-management work in Session 2.
- Tuckman's stages of team development: It frames the team diagnosis and charter work in Session 6.
- Kotter's eight-step change model: It organises the change plan built in Session 9.

- Newly appointed directors who are moving from technical expertise to people leadership.

Typical functions include finance, operations, healthcare administration and public services.

Methodology

The programme rests on simulation and peer review. Participants lead short scenarios with actors and fellow delegates, receive structured feedback against observable behaviours, and repeat the scenario with an adjusted approach. Input sessions stay brief, so that most of each day is spent practising, observing and reflecting on real leadership situations brought by the group.

- Suggested activity: Leading a simulated team meeting while an observer records the behaviours used.
- Suggested activity: Holding a difficult feedback conversation in a three-person rotation.
- Suggested activity: Presenting a change case to a panel of peers who challenge it.

Capstone Output

Each participant completes a leadership action plan for one live challenge. It holds a style profile, a development priorities list, an influence plan, a decision record, a conversation script and a change plan with SMART objectives. The plan is taken back to the workplace to guide the first ninety days of applying the skills with the team.

Frequently Asked Questions

Is intensive leadership skills training suitable for managers who already lead teams?

Yes. This course assumes current people management experience and builds on it through practice, feedback and reflection rather than basic management theory.

Which models does intensive leadership skills training rest on here?

It rests on Situational Leadership, Goleman's emotional intelligence model, Tuckman's stages of team development and Kotter's eight-step change model.

How is the action plan from intensive leadership skills training used at work?

You use it to guide your first ninety days back, brief your own manager and agree development priorities with your team.

How does intensive leadership skills training differ from a course on strategic management?

It centres on personal influence, team behaviour and conversations, while strategic management centres on market position, planning and resource allocation.
